

How to See a Breakup Coming—And Build a Relationship That Lasts

MAR. 31, 25

You've probably heard the phrase "it didn't happen overnight." And when it comes to breakups, turns out that's not just a comforting cliché—it's science.

A new study in the Journal of Personality and Social Psychology followed over 11,000 people across Germany, Australia, the U.K., and the Netherlands for up to 21 years. Researchers were looking at long-term relationship satisfaction and what really happens in the lead-up to a split. Spoiler: the red flags start waving way earlier than most of us realize.

But here's what's really useful: the data doesn't just tell us how relationships end—it offers a roadmap for how to keep them strong.

The Two-Phase Dip—and What You Can Do About It

According to the study, romantic relationships that eventually end follow a two-stage decline:

- 1 The Preterminal Phase: A slow, subtle decrease in satisfaction that can stretch out for years. Think fewer shared laughs, more emotional distance, and a growing sense that you're not quite on the same page anymore.
- 2 The Terminal Phase: About 7 to 28 months before a breakup, satisfaction starts to plummet. This is often when one partner (usually the one who initiates the breakup) emotionally checks out. The other may not hit this crash point until much closer to the end.

We now have a scientific model that shows when that dissatisfaction becomes critical. And that opens up a window for reflection, change, or conscious uncoupling, with less drama and more wisdom.

It also challenges the old narratives. The “sudden breakup,” the “midlife crisis,” the “grass is greener” storylines don’t really hold up when we zoom out. What we’re looking at is often a slow drift... and then a quick unraveling.

If you want to build a relationship that actually gets better with age, you’ve got to get curious during the slow phase before it becomes the fast one.

Five Ways to Increase Relationship Resilience

Here’s what the science (and a little lived experience) tells us about relationships that last:

1. Name the Drift Early

You don’t need a major crisis to check in. If things feel off, even slightly, talk about it. Research shows the earlier the intervention, the more likely couples are to rebound.

2. Stay Emotionally Literate

One of the best predictors of relationship longevity isn’t how much you love each other, it’s how well you navigate emotional tension. That means recognizing your own stress responses and being able to hold space for your partner’s.

3. Invest in Micro-Maintenance

Big gestures are great, but it’s the small stuff, daily kindness, real listening, quick repair after conflict that keep the floor from rotting out.

4. Turn Towards Bids for Affectoin

Every time your partner reaches out, whether by asking a question or sharing a story, they’re making a “bid” for connection. Couples who acknowledge these moments are more likely to stay connected through life’s inevitable transitions.

5. Normalize Evolving Together

You’re not the same person you were at 30. And neither is your partner. Long-term love isn’t about staying the same; it’s about growing side-by-side, with space for reinvention.

Most breakups aren’t explosive. They’re gradual and then suddenly fast. But if you can spot the drift and tend to the roots early, you’re already ahead of the curve. Because strong relationships don’t just happen. They’re built, gently, intentionally, and with enough awareness to course-correct before things start to slide.

?

The information provided in this article is for educational and informational purposes only and is not intended as health or medical advice. Do not use this information to diagnose or treat any health condition. Always consult a qualified healthcare provider regarding any questions you may have about a medical condition or health objectives. Read our disclaimers.

WRITTEN BY:

Heather Hurlock